Water

This past week water had a personal impact on my life. There was a service interruption, so I had no water. I could not shower or brush my teeth. This got me thinking that many third world countries do not have running, clean water at their disposal. People don't often realize that federalism plays a role behind the scenes when it comes to water. Most of the time we all take something as simple as water for granted. To be honest, it wasn't until taking this class that made me think of everything that goes into play when it comes to the government. The Federal state is involved with the water Acts and the water laws ensuring water safety and quality. The state comes up with the rules for managing and conserving the water supply. The local government is what impacts me the most because they are the ones who make sure that the city's public utility system is up to par and handles the water system and making sure we have no service disruptions. They make sure the water that I drink is clean, filtered and up to code. People often take for granted the water we have at our disposal until they experience a water outage. Understanding how all the levels of government work together for something so basic and essential is an eye opener. I ended up going to my parent's house who reside 10 mins away until the water got turned back on.
